Challenge Stigma / Find Peace

FrontlineFolks | Guide #38

When You Feel Like the Villain

A Field Guide for Frontline Folks and Their Families

Field notes for when you believe you're the perpetrator, not the victim.

By Michael Jenkins, MS, MSW, LCSW
Never Forgotten Services, PLLC

Disclaimer

This guide is for general education only.

It is not:

- Therapy
- Medical care
- A crisis service
- Individualized advice

Reading this guide does not create a therapist–client relationship with the author or with Never Forgotten Services, PLLC.

If you are in crisis or thinking about harming yourself or someone else, call 988 in the United States, go to your nearest emergency room, or contact your local emergency services.

If you want mental health treatment, please contact a licensed provider in your state or call the number on the back of your insurance card.

Table of Contents

1. What Is Happening
2. Why It Escalates
3. What To Do This Week
4. For Partners and Team
5. When To Get More Help
6. 7-Day Field Drill
7. Worksheets
    - Worksheet 1: Worksheet: When You Feel Like the Villain
    - Worksheet 2: Worksheet: When You Feel Like the Villain - Partner/Team Check-In

1. What Is Happening

You see yourself as the bad guy. Maybe you hurt someone (physically, emotionally, professionally). Maybe you were ordered to do something and you did it. Maybe you froze when someone needed help. Maybe you didn't speak up. Now you believe you're the villain in this story. You're the threat. You're the perpetrator. This isn't guilt about one action—it's an identity conviction: you ARE the problem, and that's permanent and unforgivable. The shame is different from regular guilt. It's character-level condemnation.

Common signs

- Self-as-villain identity: You see yourself as fundamentally bad, not just having done something bad.
- Inability to forgive yourself: You can believe others deserve compassion, but not you.
- Rumination on harmful actions: You replay what you did, collecting evidence that you're evil.
- Self-punishment: You engage in self-harm, self-sabotage, or self-imposed isolation.
- Difficulty accepting compliments: If someone says you're good, you dismiss it or feel they're confused.
- Hypervigilance to your own badness: You're watching for evidence that proves you're the perpetrator.
- Avoidance of victims or those you harmed: You can't face them because they'll confirm you're evil.
- Belief in your own irredeemability: You've done something unforgivable so repair is impossible.

> This is shame, not character diagnosis:
> Believing you're fundamentally bad is a trauma response, not a fact about your worth.

2. Why It Escalates

You did something (or failed to do something) and your nervous system concluded 'I am the threat.' If what you did hurt someone, shame locked in. If you were ordered to do something harmful, and you obeyed, shame tells you that obedience proves you ARE willing to cause harm. Your brain conflates action with identity. You protect yourself with more self-punishment (if you hurt yourself before others can, you have control). Add moral injury (you violated your own conscience) and you get a locked belief: I am bad, unforgivable, and irredeemable.

Common amplifiers

- Rumination loops: Action → shame → collecting evidence of badness → deeper conviction of being villain.
- Self-punishment escalating: Minor mistakes become proof of evil intent.
- Isolation deepening: You avoid people who might love you and prove the shame wrong.
- Hypervigilance to your own capacity for harm: Every normal impulse (frustration, self-interest) is evidence you're bad.
- Belief in permanence: 'I did X, therefore I am bad forever. This never changes.'
- Refusal of repair: Even if someone forgives you, you can't accept it—it doesn't match your self-image.
- Secondary shame: Shame about the shame. You know other people don't beat themselves this way, so you're weak too.

3. What To Do This Week

You can rebuild a more complex relationship with what you did—separating the action from your worth, and understanding context without excusing the harm.

1. Name the action specifically: What did you do or fail to do? Not 'I'm a bad person,' but 'I did X.'
2. Understand the context: Were you ordered to do it? Were you in survival mode? Were you the only one choosing? Context is not excuse, it's information.
3. Separate action from identity: You did something wrong. That makes you human, not evil. Humans make mistakes, cause harm, or fail under pressure.
4. Examine the rumination: Your brain is collecting evidence of your badness. Notice it's selective. Would you judge someone else this harshly? Why is your standard different?
5. Make specific amends if possible AND safe: Direct apology, changed behavior, restitution—something concrete if the person wants it.
6. Accept that amends might not be accepted: Even if you repair, the person may need to stay away. That's their right and it doesn't mean you're still evil.
7. Practice self-compassion: If a person you love did what you did in the same context, could you see their humanity? Can you apply that same seeing to yourself?
8. Address the specific moral injury: Work with someone on the gap between your actions and your values.
9. Rebuild your identity carefully: You're not good or bad. You're complex. You're capable of harm and repair. Both are true.

> Field rule: set the bar low enough to do it even on your worst day.

4. For Partners and Team

Stress communication should be clear, brief, and repeatable. Predictable routines protect relationships.

- Use concrete language: 'I did something I regret deeply. I'm trying to understand how it happened and how to live with it.'
- Name what you need: 'I need help believing I'm not fundamentally evil. I need to know repair is possible.'
- Invite them in: 'I'm struggling with guilt and shame about what I did. I need your patience while I figure this out.'
- Support their reaction: If they're hurt, they get to be. You don't get to demand forgiveness to feel better about yourself.

---

5. When To Get More Help

Self-guided tools are a start. Escalate care when symptoms persist, spread, or begin harming safety and function.

- Self-harm ideation or behavior is accompanying the shame.
- You're unable to accept forgiveness or make amends because you believe you're irredeemable.
- The shame is paralyzing your functioning at work or home.
- You're isolating because you believe no one would love you if they knew.
- Trauma-informed therapy or groups for moral injury specifically address this self-villain identity and help rebuild self-compassion.

6. 7-Day Field Drill

Use the worksheet every day for one week. Track trigger, body signal, and reset action. Keep what works and remove what does not.

> Daily drill:
> 1) Name the trigger.
> 2) Name the first body signal.
> 3) Run one reset action.
> 4) Log response quality.

Worksheet 1: Worksheet: When You Feel Like the Villain

Use this to track the pattern in this chapter and build a practical response you can repeat under load.

Where did this pattern show up this week?

List specific moments at work, at home, and in transition.

What did it cost you when it took over?

Name impact on body, mood, decisions, and relationships.

What two actions will you run for the next 7 days?

Choose actions small enough to use on hard days.

1. Trigger:

What activated the pattern?

2. Early body signal:

What did your body do first?

3. Reset action used:

What fast action lowered intensity?

4. Better next response:

What exact behavior will you use next time?

> Track this daily for one week, then tighten the plan around what actually worked.

Worksheet 2: Worksheet: When You Feel Like the Villain - Partner/Team Check-In

Use this page for one short practical check-in each week.

What do others notice first when this pattern is active?

Capture observable behavior, not labels.

What support helps most and least?

List what helps and what escalates the issue.

What agreement will you both practice this week?

One clear action from each side.

1. Signal phrase:

What phrase means pause and reset?

2. Time-to-return commitment:

When will re-engagement happen?

3. Repair step:

What specific repair happens after a rupture?

> Keep check-ins short, specific, and repeatable.

Closing

You've seen and carried more than most people will ever know.

Blow ups and shutdowns are not proof that you're broken or that your relationship is doomed.

They are signs that your nervous system has been running in survival mode for a long time.

The fact that you picked up this guide and read it matters.

You are choosing to be intentional about how you show up for the people who matter to you.

That choice is a lot more powerful than having flawless days.

About the Author

Michael Jenkins, MS, MSW, LCSW

Founder, Never Forgotten Services, PLLC

Michael is a U.S. Army combat veteran and licensed clinical social worker who specializes in working with military, veterans, and first responders—our frontline folks. After leaving the military, he spent years fighting his own demons and trying to figure out why he could hold it together on the job but feel completely wrecked at home. The turning point was realizing he wasn't the only one living that split life—and that nobody should have to feel that alone, confused, or broken by what the job asks of them.

Since then, his work has focused on trauma, the impact of high-stress jobs on home life, and helping families make sense of what the job brings home. He uses plain language, zero shame, and a "you're not crazy, this actually makes sense" approach to help frontline folks and their families understand what's happening in their nervous systems and learn how to move through the chaos together.